ship of the Foreign Relations Committee as the twenty-first century begins.\textsuperscript{23}

And what about Hoosier politicians in the twenty-first century? It would be well to conclude on a hopeful note, but I cannot. We live in a society where celebrity matters more than public service, where looking good on television matters more than competence, and where personal honesty matters not at all to an apparent majority of the voters. James H. Madison is right about moderation as the essence of the Indiana way. The movers and shakers inside the Beltway just don’t appreciate Hoosier virtues or Indiana politicians. They prefer style to substance. They don’t give a damn about the state of the union. A fair proportion of our Indiana politicians are better than ever, but not enough of our fellow citizens seem to care.\textsuperscript{24}
